It certainly makes it difficult. The fact that it is difficult, however, is evidently not deterring various people and various agencies from attempting such a classification, and in fact the necessity of such a classification for certain purposes is becoming every day more marked. State boards of health, for example, are in an ever larger number of states receiving authority to determine the conditions upon which a license to practice medicine shall be granted. One of the common conditions is that the candidate shall have graduated from a reputable medical school. As soon as such a public regulation is adopted it becomes necessary to determine what a reputable medical school is. Hence arise not merely the questions as to the length of course, quality of...
